The Tuxedo

In 1860, Henry Poole made a short evening or smoking jacket for the Prince of Wales to wear at informal dinner parties at Sandringham. In 1896, a Mr. James Potter of Tuxedo Park, New York visited London and subsequently was invited by the Prince to spend a weekend at Sandringham. He was also advised that he could have a smoking jacket made by the Prince's tailors, Henry Poole & Co.

When the Potters returned to New York, Mr. Potter proudly wore his new smoking jacket at the Tuxedo Park Club and fellow members soon started having copies made for themselves which they adopted as their informal uniform for club "stag" dinners. As a result, the dinner jacket became known as a Tuxedo or Tux in America.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A HENRY POOLE SUIT

design clothing from a blank canvas, the client adding his own individual choice.

Poole was, as Prince Minister Disraeli described him in his novel Endymion 'the most fashionable tailor in London [and] so intimate to his art', making tailoring history in 1860 with a short evening or smoking jacket cut for the Prince of Wales to wear at informal dinner parties at Sandringham. When invited to one such weekend, American Mr James Potter of Tuxedo Park asked Henry Poole's advice. Poole's promptly cut Potter a dinner jacket in the style popularised by his host the Prince of Wales. When Potter returned to New York, he proudly wore his new smoking jacket at the Tuxedo Park Club and thus set a fashion for informal ambience for club 'stag' dinners. As a result the Henry Poole & Co dinner jacket became known as a Tuxedo in America.
